I was having a conversation with a friend over the weekend about city versus country living. This other person was busting up some of the misconceptions I had about living in a smaller, more spread out place, as I've only ever lived in a city or suburb close to a city. My major argument was this: in a place that is mostly farmland, not only do I have no place to get fabulous shoes, I have nowhere to wear those shoes and have them appreciated.

This conversation has been marinating for a few days now, and I've been thinking a lot about why we wear the things we wear. A lot of it is about ourselves; our self image, what we are preparing for, etc. But it's also about how we interact with the world. Clothes can be conversation starters, clues to someone that you're on the same team. Appreciating other people's outfits and having mine appreciated can be an important and community building experience. Generally I try to dress for the day I want to have, and I want all my days to be colorful and interesting.

After a weekend of several social engagements where I planned all my outfits super carefully, and also didn't get a lot of sleep, I was a little under the weather this week. I have a weekly breakfast date with two of my closest ladies, and this week, I got there first. My friend Krista came in and was shocked that I was punctual, and dressed in black. I just wanted to be cozy, and was in dark jeans, a really soft black long sleeved shirt, and a black cardigan. She almost didn't recognize me.

I wish I'd had Doverfell to wear. It would have been just the cozy thing, while still being bright and beautiful.

I have a serious crush on this sweater, and my favourite parts are the textured panels in front and the shape of the hood. It's just so darn cute.

Right now in Toronto, there is a David Bowie exhibit at a local museum, and fashion features prominently in the show. I'll admit that half the reason I want to go is to see what everyone in attendance will be wearing. It's sort of the theme for the set of outfits below; I thought about how three very different women might wear Doverfell at the Bowie exhibit.

How will you wear Doverfell?

By the way, did you notice that Doverfell is also available in kid's sizes?? How will your small friend wear Doverfell??
